

Seasons Come, Seasons Go

Change: the one and only constant—until....

Autumn in the southern USA is a time of beauty—not just to the eye, but to all the senses. The color that fills the trees is delightful. The air is cooler and crisper after the long, stifling summer. The songs of the birds change as the coming of winter in the north sends the summer birds south. And there is almost a frantic sense of activity among the resident wildlife—those that will brave the winter—as they gather the last supplies for their winter cupboards.

Soon the last berry will have been harvested; the last acorn and hickory tucked in some hideaway. And before we know it, all the hustle and bustle will have ceased.

No announcement will be made that on a certain date the gathering will stop. No signs in the sky that now is the time to dig in for the days of cold. One day we will look around outside and realize that we haven't seen the squirrels for a while, or the chipmunks, or the racoons. Their work is over; now comes a time of survival.

Scientists are not entirely sure how the animal mind operates. It is not known how much of their activity is instinct and how much is anticipation; do they really know what winter is all about; while they sit in the winter homes, do they look forward to spring? Judging by the amount of food we stumble across in our summertime pruning, the wildlife appears to gather more than it needs. Curious—that there is more available than is needed, just in case.

The seasons on our planet home tumbling through the cosmos are both interesting to the curious, and portentous to the watchful. Though right now we humans just flick the AC switches from “summer” to “winter,” the rest of the natural world behaves very differently; flowers die back to protect their life below the soil; trees draw their sap from the branches to protect their roots and prevent themselves from dying from the coming frost, thus providing us a feast for the eyes as their leaves turn to warn us of the season change; animal life withdraws itself from the elements to conserve the warmth that keeps it alive.

As we look at the beauty being orchestrated around us, it is easy to be unmindful of the troubles in other parts of the world. And not just “over there,” but often closer to home—much closer to home. While one part of the world starves for lack of food, another part starves for lack of the Word of God and all the freedom that it brings. Was it John F. Kennedy who stood at the Berlin Wall and announced that Democracy has its problems, but we don't have to build fences to keep our people in? Christianity—particularly Protestant Christianity—has never been without difficulties, but has always sought to make things as good as they can be—whatever the circumstances.

One day the winter of our discontent will be upon us, never to come again. None of us knows how soon the times of sowing and gathering will be past. But we do know this, in the cold of winter is neither the time to plant nor reap. Are you watching the changes? Time to get busy!

Turn this paper over and take a look at the books and booklets that you can be sharing right now. One day all of our best efforts will be behind us. Right now we are still able to call the press and order thousands, even millions, of publications for distribution. If you aren't able to get out there, consider sponsoring someone who will find minds with which to share this important information. You won't regret it.
